High resolution maps, ships, fishing grounds, etc. Marine management. Specific subcellular localization of the Na,K-ATPase alpha 2 catalytic subunit. The Na,K-ATPase alpha 2 catalytic subunit (alpha 2) is the most important protein subunit of the Na,K-ATPase. In a recent study (Behling, L. (1994) J. Biol. Chem. 269, 26688-26698), we have described the purification of recombinant alpha 2 subunits and the generation of rabbit antibodies directed against this protein. Here, we describe the subcellular localization of alpha 2 in the brush border membrane of the CACO-2 human epithelial cell line. Using an indirect immunofluorescence assay with the anti-alpha 2 antibodies, the alpha 2 subunit is found in the plasma membrane of the CACO-2 cells. Antibodies directed against the C-terminal alpha-helix of the alpha 2 protein can also label this membrane, indicating the importance of this region for the localization of alpha 2. In the same cells, using a specific alpha 2 protein subunit antibody, we demonstrate a strong immunofluorescence signal in the plasma membrane. To determine whether alpha 2 is present in the Golgi apparatus, we have used cells fixed with Triton X-100, a detergent known to permeabilize the plasma membrane and to preserve Golgi membranes. With this approach, we show the presence of alpha 2 in the Golgi membranes, suggesting that this protein is localized in the Golgi membranes in the intact cell. These data together with our previous findings (Behling, L. (1994) J. Biol. Chem. 269, 26688-26698) indicate the existence of multiple pools of the alpha 2 subunit in the
