DIAGNOSTICS Detection of immunologic responses is frequently used in many pathological processes. Even though current anti-cancer immune therapies have transformed cancer management, no single treatment can cure all patients or even all patients with a certain cancer type. In a recent study, we identified a protein signature that distinguishes a broad variety of cancer types from normal tissue. We have created a test that detects markers of this signature, providing a new approach to theranostics and early detection of cancer. The prototype of this test, named "CERTAIN" is already in Phase I clinical trials and likely to enter the clinic within 1-2 years. Detection of tumor-derived peptides in blood The second main part of our platform is based on detection of the tumor-derived peptides in patient's blood. This test is based on MHC class I chain-related gene A (MICA) as a tumor antigen. In contrast to standard tumor markers, which only provide information about the presence of cancer after several months, this test works instantaneously. Serum Patients' serum is centrifuged to sediment all proteins. The supernatant containing the tumor antigen will be diluted by adding an appropriate number of serum from healthy donors or from patients with diseases other than cancer. The samples are incubated for 20 minutes and then antibodies raised against the MICA antigen are added. Once the antibody binds to the antigen present in the serum, it is detected by FITC-labeled secondary antibody. The amount of bound antibody is quantified by flow cytometry. Plasma Plasma is obtained by centrifuging blood from the patient. Once obtained, the supernatant is added with a specific amount of MICA antigen, as described before, and then the mixture is incubated for 20 minutes. A secondary antibody (labeled with R-phycoerythrin) is added, and the binding of the antibody to the antigen is detected by flow cytometry. The assay is mainly used to detect the presence of serum MICA antigen in patients and to follow the level of antigen expression in these patients. The test results are usually normal, but when the test reveals the presence of MICA antigen, it may indicate the presence of a cancer and can be used to control the disease. The presence of the MICA antigen in the serum (ex vivo) before the treatment allows the selection of patients for immunotherapy. When the antigen disappears after the
