company that "sells, and donates to, causes that educate people about the importance of food," as the company puts it. And you want to solve a $3 billion problem. What do you do? You start with innovation and build a customer base by developing a concept, all the while putting your name out there as a fresh approach to pet food. That's just what the people behind Edible Alternatives are doing in SoCal and central California. With less than two years under their belts, the company has already been spun out of the business it was founded to build, and has already sold $11.7 million in products. And they're still building their customer base. It all started with a dog. "I had a pit bull as a puppy in the house, and
