mcglone said that for the most part, the driver is not distracted but rather is engaged in other tasks. he said the likelihood of driver distraction is more likely when the driver is multitasking, the driver is tired and the car is not capable of handling the driving task 100% of the time. in the future, carmakers are likely to have to invest in new levels of sensor technology to perform driver monitoring functions. as far as face-based authentication, mcglone said facial recognition based authentication is coming to the consumer market with the help of technical partnerships, but consumers need to be aware of the cost associated with those technologies and how much they may be willing to give up in order to obtain a perceived or actual benefit. mcglone said the next frontier in driver assistance and safety is likely to be the development of a wide range of technologies that can be controlled and interacted with with visual and auditory cues. a variety of technologies, including cameras, sensors, lidar and radars are all being used to collect information on the drivers attention and behaviour. porsche is one of several automakers to incorporate cameras into the driver assistance system, with the intent of using the data to detect the driver is fatigued. other automakers are using cameras to detect driver fatigue in order to activate warnings, changes in the vehicle control, and alert the driver to take the next break or call it a day. in the case of the former, the system will warn the driver and require them to rest, while in the latter, the system will warn the driver, and if they do not take the break, or call it a day, then the system will take over the driving task. where such technologies are used, the onus is on the driver to be aware of their fatigue and the vehicles capabilities, and to take the appropriate action.
