By 1988, cocaine was being widely available. In 12th grade students, the prevalence of use in 1988 was 30%. This prevalence rate continues to hover around 30% throughout the 1990s and well into the 2000s. Throughout this period, crack use has remained relatively stable, though its association with methamphetamine use has recently increased significantly. Among 12th grade students, in 1988, 15% reported ever having used methamphetamine, though its prevalence has increased to 42% in 2008, or about one-fifth of the student population (though again, a substantial fraction of this number report occasional use). Crack use in 1999 was 21% among 12th graders. From 1999 to 2008, it decreased to 17%. The 2000s has seen a steady increase of crack use, reaching 22% in 2008. However, it appears that this proportion of use is not as great among Whites as it is for Blacks (Crack Figure 2, CDC). As has been frequently noted, the white-to-black ratio of the percentage of students who use crack has increased from 4:1 in the early 1990s to 5:1 in the 2000s, with the increase among Blacks considerably greater (3:1) than that among Whites (2:1). There has also been an increase in Hispanic use, though the white-to-Hispanic ratio has not changed significantly. This pattern has not changed in the most recent years of this study. (Several explanations have been offered for this pattern of cocaine use. In particular, there has been recent evidence that crack use is rising even among Whites, despite some widely held conceptions of crack users as predominantly Hispanic (see this report by the Race and Drugs website for a summary of evidence for this assertion).
